The utility of clinical genetic testing for the detection of disease risk and recurrence of disease is in doubt. Given this, and the perceived detrimental impact of extensive investigations on patients and families, there is a need for an evidence-based approach to the appropriate indications for ordering testing. The aim of this study was to identify the appropriate indications for referral to a clinical genetic testing laboratory in the context of a community based population. A questionnaire (n = 19,063) was mailed to family physicians in the province of New South Wales, Australia, between June and December 2010, to be completed by the referring physician. The survey consisted of 10 questions regarding the clinical presentation of the patient, reasons for referral and the clinical genetic testing requested. Of the respondents, 97.4% indicated an increased level of disease awareness regarding that condition. Most referrals occurred as a direct result of clinical or screening investigation (45.9%), or in response to patient/patient family request (41.3%), with a minority of referrals occurring as a direct result of a patient investigation (4.7%) or patient family request (1.7%). Referrals were more likely to occur in the context of a family history (53.6%) than on an individual patient basis (47.5%). Substantial variation was evident between physicians in the indications for referral and in the proportion of referrals resulting in testing being undertaken. In the context of a community population, doctors had a high level of awareness regarding familial risk for a condition, and referred patients and families for testing on the basis of their family history and request.IPL franchisees seek legal remedy New Delhi: The IPL franchisees should approach the tribunal or arbitrators to resolve the relationship disputes, Cricket Association of Bengal (CAB) president Jagmohan Dalmiya has told
