For 45 days before the November election, NPR's new poll tracker, Real Clear Politics' Debate Tracker, will rank the presidential candidates according to a polling average. Today, we update the polls to reflect performances from Thursday's debates and other major events. Who's ahead in the polls? In the Real Clear Politics average, Mitt Romney's lead has expanded from 3.3 points to 5.6 points over President Obama. (Romney is actually 5 points up in this graph, but the five-point spread is obscured by the data window.) Before tonight, the margin had narrowed four times since the second debate, when Romney's big bounce stalled out. Still, it was four points on the last day of October, before Romney lost Wisconsin and a couple days before the third debate. The evolving polling average Gross variables The Real Clear Politics debate tracker polls according to an average of all polls listed on the RCP website. In addition to the average, it shows the number of times a candidate has led, the number of times he has been tied, and the margin, which is the average of all polls that have Obama leading by at least 2 points. (The margin this week is not all that different from the margin before the debate.) Though he's been closer to where he started this week, his margin is still quite large — it's the largest for any candidate on the tracker this week. Also, the polls have been fairly steady, with only a slight increase in the last two days. Most states All but three states have been in the margin. But if you look at the states, the margins tend to be small. The states that have been close are usually pretty close — Alaska and North Carolina are the only two that are more than 4 points apart. The margin in the states Obama won in the last
