The discovery of human papillomavirus (HPV) in the early 1980s revolutionized our understanding of the etiology of cervical cancer and other papillomatous HPV-related tumors. Significant progress has been made in the last 10 years in delineating the physical and molecular characteristics of HPV, the transforming potential of specific HPV types, the biology of HPV-associated lesions, the role of HPV in neoplastic development and progression and the role of the viral oncogenes in malignant transformation. Knowledge gained has led to the testing of vaccines against HPV infection. This review examines recent advances in understanding 82138339de
