Obesity is a major public health problem. This study examined differences in the social costs and benefits associated with being obese or nonobese among adults who participate in the 2009 Michigan Behavioral Risk Factor Survey (N = 3670). Findings indicated that obese people had higher social costs, including higher work, social and psychological costs; lower psychological benefits; and higher medical costs. Obese women had higher work, social and psychological costs and lower medical costs than obese men. Nonobese women had higher work, social and psychological costs than nonobese men. Findings suggest that there is a need for targeted prevention and intervention programs to reduce the social costs and benefits associated with obesity.* * Licensed to the Apache Software Foundation (ASF) under one * or more contributor license agreements.
