What's new:

—and the need for new technology It's a quarter past midnight. A hush falls over the classroom. Students face one another in awkward silence. A line forms at the door. All that awaits them is a 3-hour wait—for tomorrow's exam. In the next row of this auditorium, students quietly eavesdrop on a noisy conversation between a few friends. Meanwhile, the lecturer at the podium is focusing on the delicate porcelain vase in the center of the table. He wears glass-rimmed glasses that slide easily over his blue eyes, as he reminds his listeners, "The story is one of the most stunningly beautiful and romantic presentations of all time." The other 40 students are listening intently, their eyes focused on the rippling vase, which seems to rest between worlds: "At once, it seems, both solid and transparent, uncertain of its own existence." The lecturer continues: "Even before it was fashioned, he saw the first struggling struggles of the heart and thought of his dead Lenore." The class leaps into action. They burst into excited voices: "Even before it was fashioned, he saw the first struggling struggles of the heart," "he saw the first struggling struggles of the heart," "the first struggling struggles of the heart," "the first struggling struggles of the heart," "the first struggling struggles of the heart." Sitting quietly near the exit, a guard quietly nods at a different conversation: "Even before it was fashioned, he saw the first struggling struggles of the heart." But the rest is just gone; I can't even picture the party itself. What happened was that I said yes to a friend of a friend, and started walking towards an empty corner of the room, when some hands reached out
