Stress- and inflammation-triggered signal transduction: implications for psychoneuroimmune interaction in depression. Much clinical and experimental evidence indicates that depression is associated with activation of the hypothalamic-pituitary-adrenal axis and the sympathoadrenal system. Furthermore, stress-related peripheral biological markers for these systems are elevated in major depressive disorder (MDD).

There is also abundant evidence implicating dysfunction in the neural reward circuitry in depression and the biological basis of this dysfunction has only recently begun to be characterized. Many key neurotransmitters, including the catecholamines, the biogenic amines (norepinephrine and serotonin) and the amino acid transmitters (dopamine and gamma-aminobutyric acid), are pivotal for motivational behaviors and in the regulation of stress responses. The effects of stress on the activity of these major neurotransmitter systems are cell- and region-specific, being particularly pronounced in the brain and of shorter duration than other stress hormones, such as glucocorticoids. The downstream cellular events associated with the stress-induced changes in transmitter activity include altered gene transcription and changes in receptor density and function in neurons, glia, and glial precursors. In addition, the pituitary/hypothalamic-pituitary-adrenal axis and the sympathetic system trigger changes in the activity of other transmitters, including glutamate, neuropeptides, and cytokines, which produce an ensemble of biological effects that are typically perceived as stress, and indeed are very similar to many of the symptoms of major depression. Thus, an understanding of the interplay between these complex systems is crucial to defining the psychoneuroimmune mechanism of depression. Viruses and their therapeutic manipulation. We review the general biochemistry and pathobiology of viruses as their therapeutic manipulation is evaluated. The progress in the treatment of human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) infection over the past two decades is summarized and recent advances in the use of recombinant and naturally occurring viruses as gene transfer vehicles in a variety of diseases including cancer, transplantation, and diabetes are discussed. Finally, the continued limitations of gene therapy are outlined and the future of this biotechnology is envisioned. The RFA has been designed to address the need for a readily deployable, inexpensive, and sustainable tool for developing countries to catalyze the development of the natural resources upon which they must depend for their economic and social development. It is a unique opportunity to address the rapidly growing problem of
