For many applications, particularly in laser beam steering systems, the use of two crossed linear polarizers requires exact knowledge of the phase difference between them. The phase information may be obtained interferometrically by scanning the laser beam across a diffraction grating and observing the resulting fringe pattern. We demonstrate that a flat mirror deflects the beam so that the interference pattern is observed laterally rather than vertically, as might be expected by scanning from a vertical diffraction grating. The lateral approach is applicable to devices where scanning of the beam is not available. The mirror is fabricated by peeling the grating from a silicon substrate and a high-reflectivity coating is plated on its surface. Bei uns ist am Mittwoch so etwas geschehen, was ich persönlich nie ge
