Selective arterial embolization in the treatment of review the indications, effectiveness, and complications of selective arterial embolization in the treatment of renal tumors. We conducted an extensive MEDLINE search through PubMed to identify all clinical studies published up to November 2007, containing original investigations that were based on a case series, case report, or series with > or =10 cases. Articles were reviewed, and their references were checked for additional studies. Only papers presenting original data on the treatment of renal tumors by selective arterial embolization were included. Where more than 1 article reported on the same case, only the article with the most relevant data was included. All papers focused on hepatocellular or renal cell carcinomas, mostly in renal cell carcinoma. Diagnosis was mainly made by computed tomography and/or magnetic resonance imaging. The most frequent indications were palliation of pain or hematuria and treatment of patients with a high risk of bleeding. The most commonly used embolization materials were polyvinyl alcohol particles. Embolization was effective technique in the treatment of patients with renal tumors who have a high bleeding risk. The complication rate of this procedure is low. In controlled studies, it is more effective than bland embolization. In experienced centers, e79caf7774b
