In February 2016, leading global banks removed more than half of all Western Union money transfers to the Philippines amid the ongoing Remittance Value Chain Disruption (RCVD) caused by the transaction block of the digital currency Bitcoin. The latest report from the ATM Alliance (ATMA) showed that in 2015 the Philippines received more than $2.39 billion, or $2.35 billion, in remittance transfers, a decrease of 10 percent from the previous year. The ATMA said the country's remittance value from January to December 2014 was $4.53 billion, and the value in 2015 was $4.01 billion. The report said the remittance drop was attributable to the revolution of digital payments. "The new digital payment technology that supports P2P and P2B type of transactions are powerful enough to shift the remittance value chain and reduce the influence of intermediaries," the ATMA reported. The value of remittance transfers is comprised of three components: the cost of converting Philippine pesos, or PHP, to U.S. dollars, the cost of sending the money from the sender's home country to the recipient's home country and the value of the currency exchange rate. This year's total remittance value was equivalent to 9 percent of the Philippines' GDP, the report said, adding the total transfer value is expected to increase in 2016.
