The gland of the snake Viperidae contains two cell types: secretory cells which store the bioactive substances (enzymes and toxins) and principal cells which secrete the product of the gland. Secretory cells contain numerous clear and electron dense secretory granules. Toxins and other proteins are packaged in these granules and then released into the circulatory system. Principal cells contain many mitochondria and are characterized by the presence of a specialized region called the acini, where the secretory products are elaborated. The acini are spherical droplets of intercellular canaliculi into which the secretory products are released. These products are then distributed to the blood where they are adsorbed by endothelial and lymphocyte cells. In addition, toxin molecules may remain in the acini themselves, where they are retained. The Atlantic is a commendable publication but in my opinion there are too many boring articles with weak sourcing and too little in the way of originality. In the end, whether a particular article is interesting or not, and whether it contributes or not, can always be measured by its reach. Is the article read by 1,000 people? How many of these people are angry at the author for proving them wrong? Fewer and fewer. The general public know more about modern history and politics than many authors writing for the Atlantic, but they get the impression that this is all that is happening in the world. This is not necessarily what is happening, but it's what the public perceives is happening. In my view, the Atlantic's scoops and originality, including the FT and the Economist, are still found in the Economist. (I have emailed to ask for a comment from the Atlantic's Editor and possibly also an article by Matt Ridley to comment on the originality and quality of the Atlantic's articles. I shall update this entry with any comments I get.) As for "pure" journalism, I think a good many people would be horrified that the FT should be accused of killing the reputation of journalism.
