The overall goals of the proposed project are to determine the mechanisms by which ethanol and acetaldehyde produce neurotoxicity in human and animal brains and to find new strategies for mitigating these deleterious effects. In order to achieve these goals, several lines of investigation will be undertaken. The first of these will be to develop, characterize and apply in situ hybridization methods for the human, rat and mouse brain to study the expression of alcohol dehydrogenase (ADH) I and II and ADH-cofactor (zinc and/or nicotinamide) mRNA with special emphasis on brain regions that are known to be susceptible to alcohol-induced damage (amygdala and hippocampus). The second line of investigations will be to study the acute and chronic effects of ethanol on these ADH transcripts. Using such investigations as a beginning point, the study of long-term ADH metabolism will be begun. This will involve examining the metabolism of ethanol and acetaldehyde in the hippocampus of human subjects who are ethanol abusers who, while undergoing neuropsychological evaluation, will receive intravenous infusions of ethanol. The third line of research will involve performing a chronic infusion study of ethanol and/or acetaldehyde in the rat. The animal model chosen is the rat because it does not metabolize ethanol as rapidly as humans and, consequently, has a long-term metabolic memory to changes in ethanol levels. Animals will be given a chronic infusion of ethanol and/or acetaldehyde in order to study the neurodegenerative effects of chronic elevated ethanol concentrations in the brain. The method of ethanol metabolism will be controlled by measuring ethanol and acetaldehyde concentration in the cerebrospinal fluid and by determining the ADH II mRNA concentrations in the hippocampus of the animals. Whether or not the results of the chronic infusion study will parallel those obtained in vitro will be examined. The result of such an investigation should help in understanding the neuropathology of chronic alcoholism, provide further insight into the nature of the neurotoxicity associated with chronic alcohol consumption, and identify whether or not there are vulnerable individuals in the general population who are more susceptible to ethanol-induced brain damage.
