Continuing trends in the use of beta-blocking agents in chronic heart failure: defining the future. Significant advances have occurred in the pharmacologic therapy of patients with congestive heart failure. The first breakthrough came with the introduction of carvedilol, a potent beta-adrenoreceptor antagonist, particularly useful in patients with severely depressed left ventricular function, who remain refractory to conventional anti-anginal and anti-arrhythmic medications. The second breakthrough was the development of ivabradine, which is a specific, potent, and long-acting sinus node-selective pacemaker. Many other drug classes are in various stages of development, but none has been proven to be more effective than an established agent in relieving symptoms of heart failure and improving survival. Future efforts will be devoted to refining our understanding of the physiology and pathophysiology of heart failure, using new drugs or therapies. New agents continue to appear in development that will likely be modified, or even developed, for the specific pharmacologic treatment of heart failure and related arrhythmias.
