as more teens migrate online and away from face-to-face interactions with friends, it becomes more important for them to know who else is in their peer group. approximately four-in-ten teens (38%) say that knowing someone's phone number or email address is the most important way to get to know someone, and just over one-in-ten say they most often make new friends by word-of-mouth (10%). at the same time, a sizable share of teens say they mostly make friends through social media (22%) or other online means (26%), such as emailing or messaging. many teens say they don't have a lot of friends in real life. in fact, nearly three-quarters (74%) of teens say they have just a few friends in real life. this means that teens' most important sources of social support are mostly online. online groups and forums can provide teens with one of the few reliable sources of social support they have available. more than half of teens (52%) say they have learned new things or made new friends through online groups or forums. similarly, half of teens say they have learned new things or made new friends through online games. online communities are also a common source of emotional support for teens. one-third of teens (33%) say they have gotten emotional support through online groups or forums, and one-in-ten say they have gotten emotional support through online games. a smaller share (26%) reports that they have gotten emotional support from parents or other adults. the time teens spend in online groups and forums varies according to the age of the teen. the youngest teens (13- to 15-year-olds) are most likely to report spending the most time in online groups and forums. younger teens, particularly those aged 13 to 14, spend the most time on these sites.
