Adobe has been busy developing a fine-grained link management system in Photoshop CS6. The feature offers a new InLink Manager palette that lets you tag and manage links in your images. Adobe is constantly improving and refining its flagship consumer-oriented "photoshop" program, and the version featured here is no exception. It likely will be a long-lasting program as it stands, thanks to its unrivalled usefulness and the vast number of extensions offered that expand its functionality. Of course, its huge range of features allow it to utilise a remarkably wide spectrum of skills, from amateur enthusiasts to highly experienced professionals. Elements has long been a pet peeve of mine. It is a fine program for those who don't need the versatility of Photoshop. Yet many of the features that most people use are absent, and they are all eminently useful. This is partially because it is very hard to develop for an application that doesn't really fit standard scriptable image editing use cases. But the new additions show that Adobe is catching on and trying to make Elements more user friendly (in fact, that is one of its recent improvements). As a result, it is actually pretty useful, but it's not a program for everyone.

Putting sauce that's too hot on baked or grilled meat, or that's been sitting around for too long, will cause the meat to get that unattractive bluish color that gives it the flavor of groud beef. It's not critical to remove just this one sauce, but the best way to remove it is to put the steak on a rack and let it dry. Once the steak has cooled off, using a paper towel you can wipe off more of the sticky sauce, but if you waited long enough, the sauce might even have hardened into a thin film on the steak. It tends to be obvious when it's time to clean off the foods; at restaurants, cooks typically speak about things that need to be removed or placed in the kitchen fridge as they finish plating, and the ones that still have the sauce on them aren't allowed to be brought back to the table to eat. Once the steak has cooled, you can slice it and enjoy. Look for a 1 or 2. Larger numbers will indicate a more coarse texture or accessibility. You're looking for a 50 or a 60.
